However, coals from different geographic areas are characterized by different characteristics and different combustion properties, resulting in a wide range of types and maturities of coals. Higher heating value (HHV) coals, which have relatively high HHV, are more desired than low HHV coals, which typically have relatively low HHV. Coals are initially formed as inorganic, carbon-based, biological materials, which are subsequently heated to a coking temperature to decompose the organic materials and form carbonaceous hydrocarbon materials, referred to as "coke." These coke formation reactions are exothermic, and the heat thus produced enables production of relatively clean, less polluting liquid hydrocarbon fuels, such as petroleum-based fuels, by liquefying the coke, or producing electricity, or producing steam or gas, or gasification to produce synthesis gas, depending on the type of coal. Currently available coals are measured by their ash content and calorific content (calorie content per unit volume), and somewhat less commonly their specific gravity. However, these measures have significant deficiencies. Ash content is a measure of the particulate matter in the coal, and is a measure of the purity of the coal. Ash content is a criterion for assessing whether coals can be used in power generation. However, the particulate matter in a coal can consist of inorganic, organic, and elemental contaminants, and the particulate matter in a coal can be toxic. In addition, ash content is only a measure of the particulate matter in the coal, and does not reveal details regarding the nature of the particulate matter or the nature of the contaminants. Coal quality is a measure of the calorific content of coals, as measured by the calorific value of the coal
